In 1946, Kline was commissioned by the Pennsylvania Post of the American Legion to create the mural Leighton, depicting the town in which the artist attended high school. Learn from the Allentown Art Museum about how the mural was preserved and put on permanent display.

Kline's work is often compared to East Asian traditions of calligraphy. A Tate essay by art historian Eugenia Bogdanova-Kummer explores the visual and political angles to this comparison.

In 1958, the exhibition The New American Painting started its eight-country tour at the Museum of Modern Art. Read a digitized version of the exhibition catalogue and read an essay about the exhibition from the Tate, which was seen at the time as "an important bridge between American and European cultures" in the postwar era.

Read an interview between Kline and David Sylvester from 1960: "No I don't like to manipulate the paint in any way in which it doesn't normally happen. In other words, I wouldn't paint an area to make texture, you see?"

Available in the New York Times archive, "Franz Kline – A Legacy in Black and White," discusses the artist's career twenty years after the artist's death.

Read an Artforum review by Richard Shiff of the 1994 exhibition Franz Kline: Black & White, 1950-1961 at the Menil Collection in Houston. That same year, the Fundació Antoni Tàpies installed the exhibition Franz Kline: Art and the Structure of Identity.

The 2003 exhibition Franz Kline Paintings from a Private American Collection at Richard Gray Gallery displayed a selection of paintings that had never been exhibited together before.

Castello di Rivoli, Museo d'arte contemporanea launched the exhibition Franz Kline in 2004. The exhibition brought together almost one hundred works by Kline, including major large-scale paintings and their study drawings.

Watch a video by the curator of MoMA's 2010 exhibition, Abstract Expressionist New York, about Kline's work in the show.

Auction houses often produce videos about artists' work on auction. Watch one by Christie's about one inspired by the 1950s New York City jazz scene and one by Sotheby's about Elizabeth \(1958\), inspired by his ballerina wife.

A 2015 lecture by Corina Rogge and Zahira Véliz-Bomford discusses the challenge of conserving Franz Kline paintings.

Associated with the New York School in the 1940s and 1950s, Franz Kline's earlier work featured colorful landscapes, portraits, and murals. In 1948, the artist was in a frustrating slump and turned to friends Willem de Kooning (1904-1997) and Elaine de Kooning (1918-1989) for advice. As the story goes, Kline enlarged images of his work on a Bell-Opticon opaque projector in the de Kooning studio and was inspired by the abstract shadows and bold lines that emerged. The event marked a profound shift in the artist's oeuvre as he turned to black-and-white abstraction. The slashing, dramatic, seemingly spontaneous brushstrokes of Mister now define Kline's Abstract Expressionist style and Action Painting technique. However, the artist never simply painted black strokes on blank, white canvas, instead layering the colors to create complex, unified compositions. He once remarked: "I paint the white as well as the black, and the white is just as important."
