“I think it would be so great if more people took up silk screens so that no one would know whether my picture was mine or somebody else’s.” Warhol commented in a 1963 interview about the Pop Art movement. “I want to be a machine, and I feel that whatever I do and do machine-like is what I want to do.”

Warhol appeared with Edie Sedgwick on the Merv Griffin Show in 1965, complete with antics in which Sedgwick spoke for the Pop artist.

“We don’t have any feeling about [paintings] at all, even when we are doing them...It just keeps us busy. It’s something to pass the time,” Warhol commented during a haphazard interview at the Factory in 1966 on art, film, and celebrity. “Whatever anyone else says has no value to me concerning my work. I don’t need approval. I have confidence in what I’m doing.”

In a video interview at the Factory in 1966, a journalist attempted to get Warhol to discuss his interests and motivations about printing, collaborations, and film. “I’m trying to see what else a camera can do. I’m mostly concerned with doing bad camera work. We’re trying to make it so bad but doing it well, where the most important thing is happening you seem to miss it all the time, or show the most scratches on a film or all the dirt you can get on a film...so that everybody knows you’re doing a film,” the artist commented.

Camouflage, 1986-1987

Acrylic and silkscreen ink on canvas

Private Collection; L2025:36.1

Andy Warhol is one of the most influential artists of the 20th century, achieving widespread success for his paintings and silk screens drawn from consumer products, advertising, and celebrity culture. However, at the end of his career, the artist became interested in abstraction and pattern. Camouflage was included in one of the last series Warhol created before his death in 1987. Inspired by the military motif that was designed to disguise the appearance of war machines and military uniforms, the Camouflage Paintings explore the simplification of nature and abstraction of landscape in psychedelic color combinations. When he began the series, Warhol asked his studio assistants: “What can I do that would be abstract but not really abstract?”

Andy Warhol is one of the most influential American artists of the 20th century. In 1963, Warhol opened The Factory as his New York City studio space, which became a hub for artists and celebrities alike. The artist was fascinated with fame, creating series of works featuring icons from Marilyn Monroe and Elvis Presley to Mao Zedong. Double Liz gives center stage to Elizabeth Taylor, who was beautiful, famous, and at the height of her career as an actress in 1963. That year, Taylor was paid the unprecedented sum of one million dollars for her role in Cleopatra and was constantly in the media spotlight. Warhol was said to become excited at the mere mention of her name. In one interview, he exclaimed: "Ohhhh, Elizabeth Taylor, ohhhh. She's so glamorous."

Typewriter [1], 1961

Casein paint on linen

Private Collection; L2024:103.5

Pop Art icon Andy Warhol moved to New York in the late 1940s and began working in commercial illustration and advertising, while also aiming at a career as a fine artist. His fascination with celebrity, popular culture, and consumerism in American society soon seeped into his own work, and his first Pop Art paintings were displayed in the early 1960s.

Typewriter [1] was produced at this time, shortly before the artist established The Factory as his studio in Manhattan. The painting points to Warhol's interest in repetition and reproduction, a theme that continues throughout his depictions of everyday items, tabloid disasters, and A-list celebrities.

Andy Warhol is one of the most influential artists of the 20th century. Known for his iconic Pop Art style and celebrity status, Warhol was fascinated with fame, consumerism, advertising, and popular culture. His colorful silkscreen portraits often feature celebrities and “superstars,” from Marilyn Monroe and Elvis Presley to Mao Zedong. In 1974, Interview Magazine paired Warhol with infamous film director Alfred Hitchcock for conversation. The two enjoyed a morbid talk about death, murder, and the psychology of serial killers – a fascination the two filmmakers shared. Alfred Hitchcock was produced years later, as Warhol continued to reflect on Hitchcock’s monumental impact on cinema.

Private Collection; L2023:59.3

Andy Warhol's Pop Art is known for its reflection on consumerism, celebrity, advertising, and pop culture in the mid-20th century. However, the artist was also deeply engaged with art history. Details of Renaissance Paintings (Sandro Botticelli, Birth of Venus, 1492) is part of a series Warhol began in 1984 to reinterpret Italian Renaissance masterworks. In Warhol's version, the Botticelli Venus's iconic face and hair are cropped to fill the entire silkscreen. The composition mirrors Warhol's other celebrity portraits, turning the 15th century Venus into a Pop Art superstar. As the artist once said: "My idea of a good picture is one that's in focus and of a famous person." As with everything Warhol said about his art, his comment contains equal elements of truth and quite deliberate misdirection, all delivered with a wickedly dry sense of humor and irony.

One Dollar Bills, 1962

Silkscreen ink and acrylic on canvas

Private Collection; L2023:26.3

Andy Warhol was one of the most influential American artists of the 20th century. Fascinated with celebrity, consumerism, advertising, and fame, Warhol's widespread practice directly engaged with pop culture from the 1960s to the 1980s. His New York studio, called The Factory, was a hub for artists and celebrities alike. Warhol's silkscreens, photographs, films, and sculptures often engaged with these individuals and the mass-produced consumerism they represented in contemporary American culture. One Dollar Bills is part of a series Warhol started in 1962. By photographing, drawing, and silkscreening U.S. currency, the artist obsessively points out the value of these ubiquitous pieces of paper that drive our experience of life. As he once said: "Making money is art and working is art and good business is the best art."

Campbell's Soup I, 1968

Color silkscreen

Private Collection; L2021:187.1.1-10

Famous for his iconic Pop Art, Andy Warhol is one of the most influential American artists of the 20th century. In his New York studio called The Factory, Warhol produced paintings, silkscreens, photographs, films, and sculptures that explore consumerism, advertising, celebrity, and pop culture from the 1960s to the 1980s. Campbell's Soup cans are perhaps the artist's most infamous subject. Warhol first exhibited thirty-two paintings of the cans in 1962 at Ferus Gallery in Los Angeles, a display that a neighboring gallery found so ridiculous that it sold "the real thing" in its window for twenty-nine cents each. Campbell's Soup I is a selection of ten silkscreened soup cans, featuring popular flavors of Chicken Noodle, Tomato, and Pepper Pot. As ubiquitous and banal illustrations of everyday objects, the silkscreens reflect upon mass production, marketing, and consumption in contemporary American culture.

Rorschach, 1985

Acrylic and silkscreen ink on canvas

Private Collection; L2020:121.1

Andy Warhol achieved widespread popular and commercial success in New York in the early 1960s with his paintings and silk screens drawn from consumer products, advertising, and celebrity culture. Begun in 1984, his Rorschach series is one of the few in which Warhol did not appropriate pre-existing images, taking inspiration from the inkblot test invented by the Swiss psychiatrist Hermann Rorschach in 1921, which was one of the most widely used analytic tools of the 1960s. To achieve the characteristic mirrored image, Warhol painted one side of his canvas before folding it vertically to print the remaining half. Like its eponymous inkblot, the result blends chance and abstraction with an innate desire to seek out recognizable forms. In characteristic Warholian commentary—always to be taken with a grain of salt—the artist admitted to apparently misconstruing the purpose of the test, assuming each inkblot to be the creation of the patient, intended to be interpreted by the psychiatrist. He envisioned a reading and interpretation of his own creations as a finishing touch to the series.
