In the U.S, it just felt as if, ‘Oh, you could be a fine artist or you could be a commercial artist.’ There was a split division: if you do this, you can’t do that, like one thing knocks out the other. There is definitely truth in that, and still, even today you get that. You have people who are a little bit scared of commercial projects or still pretend that there is this church,” KAWS tells Juxtapoz magazine in a 2018 illustrated interview. “But for me, I enjoy just having work disseminate in different countries at the same time. That can never happen in a gallery space.” Published in conjunction with GONE, his first show at Skarstedt Gallery in New York.

KAWS talks with ARTnews in a recent profile about his foray into the collectibles market and his own collecting passions.

Multi-media artist KAWS, née Brian Donnelly, began his career as a graffiti artist in the 1990s after studying animation at the School of Visual Arts in New York. Merging commercialism and cultural reference with street art, painting, and sculpture, his work recalls the fundamentals of Pop Art and conflates the distinction between fine art and commercial objects; KAWS is in fact known for merchandising his work and has collaborated with such international brands as Dior and Nike. The artist’s animated style and use of vibrant colors are often compared to the work of Japanese artist Takashi Murakami (b. 1962). A Lonely One demonstrates a mild temperament rarely featured in KAWS’s oeuvre. His signature subversive appropriations of cartoon characters and cultural icons are absent, replaced by a graphic abstraction that seems to provide a close-up glimpse of a strange, energetic world that extends beyond the confines of the frame.
