Wassily Kandinsky is recognized as one of the first creators of modern abstract art. Born and raised in Russia, he moved to Munich, Germany, at the age of 30, where he studied painting and became a leading figure in the Blaue Reiter (Blue Riders) group of artists who helped catalyze German Expressionism. Notably, Kandinsky experienced synesthesia, a perceptual condition that allowed him to hear the colors that he painted. For him, green evoked the mid-range of a violin, yellow was middle C on a trumpet, and color combinations were complex chords on a piano. Kandinsky’s explorations of music, painting, and the spiritual were instrumental in furthering the development of abstraction in early 20th century art. Bild mit weissen Linien (Painting with White Lines) was completed in 1913, shortly before the artist had to return to Russia at the onset of World War I. The painting was exhibited throughout Russia as Kandinsky helped to establish the Soviet Museum of the Culture of Painting in the wake of the Russian Revolution. As the artist once said: “Painting is a thundering collision of different worlds, intended to create a new world in and from the struggle with one another, a new world which is the work of art.”
