Vogue’s in-depth profile, originally published in 1994, gives insight into Twombly’s enigmatic personality, which was captured through only a handful of interviews. The author visited Twombly in Italy, traveling between his homes in Rome and Gaeta as the artist prepared his Four Seasons series for an upcoming exhibition. “At a certain point I was ready to throw in the brush. But I got crazy in a good way here,” Twombly reflected about the series.

In 1994 MoMA hosted the most comprehensive exhibition of Twombly’s work in the United States, filling the third-floor galleries with 100 paintings, sculptures, and works on paper including key and lesser-known works never before seen together, tracing his development beginning in 1946 through his most recent work completed just before the exhibition opened.

The Menil Collection in Houston opened The Cy Twombly Gallery in collaboration with the artist in 1995. Twombly designed the building with architect Renzo Piano and had final say on the selection of works, which now range from 1953 to 2004 to provide a concise retrospective outline.

“I’m not too sensitive to colour, not really. I don’t use it with any nuance that I know of. The form of the thing is more interesting to me than colour. I take the colour as primary - like, if it’s the woods, it’s green; if it’s blood, it’s red; if it’s earth, it’s brown,” Twombly explained in conversations with curator Nicholas Serota as the duo prepared for the Tate Modern’s 2008 exhibition. Bringing together key works and series, the show surveyed Twombly’s career from the 1950s through present day. Serota also discussed Twombly and the exhibition during a gallery installation in Tate Shots.

American photographer Sally Mann, close friend and mentee of Twombly’s, captured the remnants of his Lexington VA studio for a memorial exhibition at the Gagosian Gallery, and a book of photographs in 2016. Taken from 1999 through 2015, Mann’s images move through Twombly’s cluttered and paint-splattered workspace, becoming material memories of creativity and artistic drive.

Twombly’s seminal Fifty Days at Iliam series (1977-78), which retells the narrative of Homer’s The Iliad in ten abstract canvases, maintains a permanent home at The Philadelphia Museum of Art. In 2017, the museum also showcased the full cycle with six sculptural parallels produced in the late 1970s.

Gagosian Gallery in London presented an exhibition of Twombly’s sculptures in 2019, celebrating the release of volume two of his catalogue raisonné. Twombly began experimenting with sculpture in the 1940s, creating assemblages of plaster, wood, iron, and found materials in his studio, which he frequently painted white – a nod to the marble sculptures of antiquity.

The Guardian traced Twombly’s career and travels in a commemorative profile following his death in 2011.

Duino, 1967
Oil-based house paint and wax crayon on canvas

Private Collection; L2021:167.1

Cy Twombly’s numerous “blackboard paintings” often feature chaotic, scrawling, glyphic marks that defy logical interpretation. Duino, on the other hand, reflects the artist’s interest in language by aligning with the more conceptual and minimalist trends of the 1960s. The painting is a tribute to the Duino Elegies, a series of poems by Bohemian-Austrian poet Rainer Maria Rilke (1875-1926) about the intersection of existential suffering and beauty. Twombly shared Rilke’s interest in words as a method of communicating an experience of the world and frequently read the poet’s work while studying at Black Mountain College in the 1950s. The semi-erased trace of the word “Duino” in the center of the canvas indicates a hesitation, which is followed by a commitment to the idea in larger block letters below.

From the Elegies:

“For our part, when we feel, we evaporate; ah, we breathe ourselves out and away; with each new heartfire we give off a fainter scent. True, someone may tell us: you’re in my blood, this room, Spring itself is filled with you… To what end? They can’t hold us, we vanish within them and around them.”

Panorama (New York City), 1955
Oil based house paint, wax crayon on canvas

Private Collection; L2021:83.1

Born in Lexington, Virginia, Cy Twombly worked alongside artists Robert Rauschenberg (1925-2008) and Jasper Johns (b. 1930) in 1950s New York. In 1955 Twombly was teaching at the Southern Seminary and Junior College (now Southern Virginia University), but traveled to New York in the summer to work in his Williams Street studio, where he painted Panorama (New York City). One of Twombly’s most famous paintings, it was first shown at Stable Gallery in 1956 and is widely regarded as a pivotal work in Twombly’s six-decade career. The massive, eleven-foot canvas features the scattered chalk-like lines that reappear in later paintings, such as Untitled (New York City), which is also on display in this gallery. The mysterious marks seem almost legible, but they still defy interpretation.

Untitled (New York City), 1967
Oil based house paint, wax crayon on canvas

Private Collection; L2021:83.2

Cy Twombly is known for his paintings that feature scrawling, glyphic marks. Drafted into the U.S. Army as a cryptologist in the 1950s, Twombly was interested in coded writing and its history in Paleolithic art. Untitled (New York City) is one of the artist’s “blackboard” paintings, which evoke scribbled notations but do not form actual words. Twombly produced many similar works between 1966 and 1971, seemingly inspired by child-like doodling and rote learning in the classroom. The repetitive blocks and lines seem to position Twombly as a student standing at the blackboard learning to “write,” rather than as a trained artist. Though he rarely gave interviews, Twombly once said: “It’s more like I’m having an experience than making a picture.”

Donna Fugata, Bassano in Teverina, 1987
Oil stick, lead pencil on wooden panel
Private Collection; L2020:88.4

Merging antiquity with the contemporary, painterly romanticism with the raw energy of graffiti, Cy Twombly occupied a pivotal role in postwar American art. After graduating from the Art Students League and Black Mountain College, Twombly turned away from the conceptual craftsmanship of friends and contemporaries such as Jasper Johns and Robert Rauschenberg, favoring the gestural declarations of Abstract Expressionism. After his permanent move to Italy in 1957, Twombly developed a more lyrical style inspired by the ancient landscape and classical literature. Donna Fugata, Bassano in Teverina plays with the duality of two reference points: donna fugata, which loosely translates to “woman who fled” or “fugitive woman,” and is the namesake of a 14th century castle in Sicily; and Bassano in Teverina, a 14th century Vatican municipality north of Rome where Tombly lived part time. The range of gesture matches the range of materials and colors, producing an image that hesitates between the tangible and intangible, with shapes and associations suggesting themselves before dissolving back into the composition.
