“Just think about how amazing the term “new” is. It suggests that somehow the old version had some potential flaw that has been resolved by this new version,” Johnson reflected in an open discussion with ArtSpace in 2013 about his academic and artistic familial upbringing, photography, identity, “Post-Black” art, and transition between mediums. “So this idea of this unmolested conscious space is one that I’m interested in exploring, both for the potential contradictions and the potential absurdity as well as the potential for it be an interesting and valuable space to explore seriously.”

Johnson’s plant-powered installations brought his first solo exhibitions in Russia and Italy in 2016, in addition to his largest show in New York. “I’m very interested in how the personal and collective meet, how often they meet, and how much we’re negotiating with our own biographies and the way that relates to the collective understanding of the world and how the experiences that we share come together,” he commented to Conceptual Fine Arts. “If I am speaking clearly from my own perspective, if it touches on those concerns, it becomes legible in ways that are engaging and complex.”

Johnson reflected on his concern for the future, his faith in viewers, creative inspirations and collaborations, and patterns of “escape” in his work during a 2018 artist talk at the Aspen Art Museum in conjunction with being awarded as the Aspen Award for Art. “I think my practice takes into account all of [my] concerns and brings them into that space, that sanctuary, that studio, and I start to kind of resolve or work through things...use different mediums and approaches as a launching pad to at least start a conversation.” Johnson returned to the AAP for his first solo museum exhibition in 2019, The Hikers, which celebrated the diversity of his practice through a display of paintings, installations, performance, and film.

“They function in some ways as cathartic tools, as ways to communicate, ways to understand gesture and mark-making, in my case different kinds of signifiers and ideas and ways of viewing the world,” explained Johnson about Anxious Audience, his 2019 show at the Power Plant in Toronto.

In 2020, Richard Grey Gallery in Chicago showcased the series that launched Johnson into artistic success in the 2001 exhibition, Freestyle, at the Harlem Studio Museum. Johnson began Seeing in the Dark at age 20 while at Columbia College, driven by the potential “to take ownership of the idea of interaction with the street and then take into a new environment that changed the discourse. It was a kind of investigation of my concerns with the street and the social aspect of how a photograph can invade a person’s space.”

2020 saw Johnson’s career reach new heights of recognition. In conjunction with an exhibition of new work that included paintings and ceramic tile mosaics, and spanned both Hauser & Wirth London gallery spaces, he spoke candidly about music, art, culture, race, and his identity as an artist with Apollo Magazine and the podcast A Brush With...

Through 2021, MoMA PS1 will host Stage, a sound installation in which Johnson explores the use of microphones in protest, public speech, and hip hop.

Bruise Painting “In Shambles”, 2021
Oil on linen

Private Collection, San Francisco; L2022:10.3

Rashid Johnson’s mixed media practice critically examines race and class in contemporary American culture. With an interest in African American history, pop culture, and identity, Johnson draws from both personal narrative and collective experiences in his work. Bruise Painting “In Shambles” is part of a series the artist began in 2021. Johnson’s Bruise Paintings followed his Anxious Red Drawings, which were made during the pandemic and reflected the isolation and loss of those years. By contrast, the Bruise Paintings are inspired by the Fats Waller jazz standard “Black and Blue,” reflecting the aftermath and healing process of both the pandemic experience and the ongoing Black Lives Matter movement. According to Johnson, the Bruise Paintings refer to “a space between blunt force trauma, such as we’ve experienced, and a healing and where we are going.” He reflected that these paintings were “some of the most satisfying things I’ve ever made in my life. They were cathartic, not simple – but every time I made them I felt alive, unburdened.”

Cast bronze

Private Collection, San Francisco: L2021:170.1

Born and raised in Chicago, Rashid Johnson explores themes of identity, personal narrative, and critical history in a wide range of media. Untitled is part of a new series of bronze totem pole planters that could house succulents and cacti. The planter's three tiers subtly reflect Johnson's motif of anxious faces that stare outward with clenched jaws. References to African American music and literature dot the surface: casts of records with Louis Armstrong singing Fats Waller's "Black and Blue" ("My only sin is in my skin / What did I do to be so black and blue?") and oyster shells from Zora Neale Hurston's 1928 essay, "How It Feels to Be Colored Me" ("No, I do not weep at the world – I am too busy sharpening my oyster knife") slice into the surface. The sculpture makes visible the intense anxieties of the last two years, particularly for Black communities in the United States. At the same time, the potential to add living succulents recognizes the capacity for growth and change in the midst of turmoil.

After studying photography at the Art Institute of Chicago in his hometown, Rashid Johnson emerged onto the art scene as the youngest artist, age of twenty-four, in the 2001 Freestyle exhibition at the Studio Museum in Harlem. Johnson's multidisciplinary practice has since expanded to encompass sculpture, installation, painting, drawing, and filmmaking, exploring personal and cultural Black identities, art and social histories, symbolic and literary narratives.

Johnson began his Untitled Anxious Red Drawings during the COVID-19 pandemic. The series elaborates on the language of turmoil expressed in his Anxious Men series (2015-2018), in which carved faces manifest the distresses of modern life. The scrambled motif seeping into the paper in horizontal bands of intense color and dramatic mark making in the Red Drawings presents a visual declaration of anxiety with unknown end; a scattered, haphazardly organized world without answers. Working from his conviction that art should be "nimble" and that artists "pivot, they don't invent," Johnson sought to alter his previous body of work through "a color that spoke to the urgency that I thought we are all facing. And that was red."
